Owner Experience Review

Owners describe the FREEDOM 225 from Grady-White Boats as a capable, family first dual-console that balances day cruising comfort with inshore fishability. The layout earns praise for generous cockpit seating and a small but usable cuddy that swallows gear and doubles as a spot for a nap; several owners mention adding a porta potty to make short outings easier. At the helm, ergonomics and visibility are routinely noted as strong points, contributing to confident handling at moderate speeds and predictable tracking in typical coastal chop.

On the water, expectations matter: with common Yamaha power in the 200–300 hp range, owners emphasize a composed, not “fast,” ride. Feedback highlights a solid feel for a 22 footer in bay chop and coastal swell, while acknowledging that seakeeping offshore is limited compared with larger center consoles. For care and ownership, routine outboard service is straightforward, but buyers of older examples are advised to inspect transom and stringer condition and verify any prior repairs. Dealer support is generally viewed positively, though parts and finish work can cost more than on mainstream brands. Specific year by year differences aren't consistently documented in owner remarks, so prospective buyers should review model year manuals for fine details.

Pros and Cons

• Family friendly dual-console layout with comfortable seating and practical cuddy storage.
• Predictable handling and a solid ride in typical bay chop for a 22 foot platform.
• Ergonomic helm and straightforward Yamaha outboard service routines.
• Not a speed boat; performance is comfortable rather than fast with typical power.
• Limited offshore capability compared with larger center consoles.
• Older boats may require close inspection of transom/stringers, and premium parts/labor can be pricey.
